Gamma (verapamil)-induced cytosolic free Ca2+ increase and contraction in vascular smooth muscle. Although the role of calcium in the contraction of vascular smooth muscle (VSM) has been well documented, the relationship between this rise in [Ca2+]i and the subsequent contractile event has not been firmly established. To investigate this relationship, we have studied the effect of gamma-aminobutyric acid (GABA), an inhibitor of VSM contraction, on [Ca2+]i and force. GABA caused a time-dependent increase in [Ca2+]i that was not prevented by nifedipine, suggesting that the increase is due to mobilization of the Ca2+ from internal stores. When the drug was added to Ca(2+)-free solution, the [Ca2+]i and force reached the same level in the same time. gamma-Aminobutyric acid did not affect the initial rise in [Ca2+]i induced by ionomycin, suggesting that it did not affect the mobilization of Ca2+ from internal stores. The increase in [Ca2+]i was due to the release of Ca2+ from internal stores because it was also prevented by pretreatment with quin 2. Application of gamma-aminobutyric acid (1 mM) in cell-free preparations induced no contraction. When nifedipine was added, the [Ca2+]i increase was prevented, but force was not affected. These findings suggest that the rise in [Ca2+]i induced by GABA is responsible for the inhibition of contraction.Q: Cannot install Homebrew on El Capitan I have El Capitan and I'd like to install Homebrew.
