I was walking to work and came across this sign in the snow. I looked around for someone to ask if I was hallucinating. Was I imagining it? It couldn't be real. I looked closer. "No, it's not." That was the moment I realized I was at the site of a major American military push -- a push I had only read about in history class. The Battle of the Bulge was one of the bloodiest campaigns of World War II. The fighting, which took place between December 16, 1944, and February 28, 1945, was an attempt by Germany to destroy American forces and re-take the Western European continent. The weather at the time was bitter cold. Snow was the norm for December in western Germany. My reaction was visceral. I had to do something. The dead lay in the snow, and there was no one to tend to them. Here, too, is what I saw. I was only 11 years old when the war ended. I remember the German surrender on May 8, 1945. I remember that the surrender ceremony was broadcast on the radio. And I remember that this war ended, but the war in my heart lasted for the rest of my life. On this site, there are no monuments of fallen soldiers. There are only their bodies, lying in the snow. The American military push began on December 16, 1944, and was supposed to be completed on February 28, 1945. I expected to see a lot of fallen men, but the site was littered with dead German soldiers. They lay with faces turned toward the ground, and I thought they were dead. I didn't know what to do. I had never seen so many dead men. I did not realize what 2d92ce491b
