Mar 2, 2020 RizkThe Federal Trade Commission (FTC) on Friday sued AT&T for providing misleading information to consumers about text message billing. The lawsuit details a practice used by AT&T, which allowed users to continue texting to their friends, without having to pay the message costs, unless the messages were sent after the recipient had turned off their smartphone's text messaging capability. The FTC suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., came in response to a complaint it received last year from the consumer group Free Press. The complaint is similar to complaints the FTC filed against American Express in 2012, and against AT&T in 2013, both of which resulted in settlements. "Providing false information to consumers about their obligations to pay for text messaging services is a deceptive trade practice," said FTC chairman Joseph Simons in a statement released Friday. "People already face plenty of temptation with their telecommunications products—from privacy concerns to the allure of games or movies. Americans shouldn't have to contend with additional scams and tricks as they go about their daily lives." At issue in the AT&T lawsuit is AT&T's billing practices, which allow users to continue to text their friends while their smartphone has been muted or turned off. By doing so, the company says the user can prevent their phone from being billed for the texts they send, or, if the user chooses, they can initiate their own fee-based texting services. Not exactly, the FTC says. The FTC complaint cites several instances in which the company billed users who hadn't opted out of its texting services, and didn't authorize any texts at all. AT&T, the complaint alleges, misled customers by stating that the company doesn't bill for
