by AJ Heideman Category:Fish in art Category:3D printingQ: Does one of these two sentences express the same idea? "The most knowledgeable people in the world are self-taught." vs. "The most knowledgeable people in the world are not teachers of other people." The example given in the book is "The most knowledgeable people in the world are the self-taught." A: Both sentences are correct and have different meanings. The most knowledgeable people in the world are self-taught. This means that all of the people are self-taught. This would be different from The most knowledgeable people in the world are not teachers of other people. In this example, people are also not teachers. In your example, the people are both teachers and are also self-taught. For a movie that is so tightly constrained by marketing, it is astounding how poorly it does. The latest critic polls show a middling Tom Hanks starring comedy with modest budget has opened to something like $42 million. I'm talking about The Da Vinci Code, a movie with no press coverage and a movie that has no media support and in fact should be a hell of a lot lower. Don't get me wrong, I enjoy a good Tom Hanks movie. He is a smart guy with lots of charisma and I can see why the major studios would be interested in selling him a movie. The same can not be said for this film. I guess, in a weird way, it makes me sad that the word "Lauren Bacall" and not "Dan Brown" has come to stand in for a mass audience response to a movie. The problem is that The Da Vinci Code is a horrible movie. It's a terrible representation of a novel, something that had the full creative and financial support of the director. It's poorly shot, it's terribly acted, and the ending is really, really stupid. There is one great scene in the film where Dan Brown wanders a museum. He sees a painting that is so large that it is a life-size sculpture and as he looks closer, he notices the figures are not real people, they are stylized to be people. He looks up at the giant image and realises that the painting is "something like" a portrait of Mary Magdalene. To prove his point, 2d92ce491b
