A large number of organic synthetic processes are carried out in the form of liquid-liquid (immiscible) and gas-liquid (miscible) solvent mixtures. The vast majority of these processes have been investigated using gas-liquid systems in which a number of technical and economic advantages are associated with the use of liquid rather than gas phases. Liquid phases are particularly useful in many chemical reactions and separation processes.

Many of the existing process applications, however, require the use of solvent mixtures in which the solvents are either gas or liquid phases, with only limited applications of liquid-liquid systems, e.g., liquid-liquid extractions. The most widely used liquid-liquid systems are based on the use of pairs of immiscible liquids, which form distinct liquid phases in equilibrium. In this case, one liquid is soluble in the other. The two liquids are used as the solvent phases in a separable one-phase system. One may also contemplate using two immiscible liquids in a system using two phases, either stable or unstable. In this case, one phase is a dispersion of one liquid in the other, e.g., a mixture of a liquid and a gas, which may be stable or unstable. Only gas-liquid systems are the most widely used systems, with liquid-liquid systems having been used in only a few applications. Use of gas-liquid liquid-liquid extraction systems (liquid-liquid extractions) has been found to be advantageous, in particular, when the objective is to effect selective separations. In particular, it has been observed that an aqueous phase can be separated from an organic solution using a pair of immiscible organic liquids. This results in a precipitate phase consisting of the organic solution and a water insoluble organic compound which is dissolved in the first organic solvent. These liquid-liquid extractions are widely known and widely used. Another type of liquid-liquid extraction, which is not intended
