illness can often be difficult to handle. One of the most helpful ways a doctor or nurse can help is to make sure your disability is fully disclosed when new tests or care is prescribed. Knowing ahead of time can make it easier to answer questions or discuss concerns, and keep your doctor or nurse from having to guess about your condition. Chronic illness can also impact the care you receive. A nurse can encourage you to take your medicines properly, and the doctor can make sure you're getting the best care for your condition, whether you have a physical disability or not. This can be especially important if you have a physical disability and you're taking other medications. Sometimes, having medical staff know about your disability can help you communicate your needs, and so your doctor can help you decide if a change in medical care is needed. Sometimes there are ways to improve your care for your disability. For example, if you have a physical disability, you may be able to use special equipment that allows you to get your medications. Or if you have a mental disability, you may be able to explain it to your doctor so that she or he understands what you need.

Q: Interface design: Input type vs use case? I'm trying to ask some interface design questions on StackOverflow but I don't think I can ask this question there.
