Responses of Chewing in Horses to Masseter Nerve Stimulation. Disruption of the masseter muscle can cause discomfort in the horse and lead to difficulties chewing. The masseter nerve lies in the infraorbital canal and is accessible by a retrograde approach. Stimulation of the nerve in the infraorbital canal will, therefore, cause the masseter muscle to contract. We measured the electromyographic responses of the masseter, superficial masseter, and temporalis muscles to stimulation at each of two locations in the infraorbital canal, using a monopolar electrode (North Coast Medical, Inc., Gilroy, CA) and a 6-mA threshold stimulation rate. The electrical current was passed in a monopolar fashion through the two stainless steel plates on which the horse was standing. This procedure caused stimulation of the masseter nerve and, therefore, muscle contractions. The responses of the three muscles were similar at each of the two sites of stimulation. The masseter and superficial masseter muscles responded with a single burst of activity. The temporalis muscle responded with two bursts of activity. The relative timing of these responses was repeatable. The responses were surprisingly large in the first few contractions. The size of the responses decreased in the subsequent contractions. When the intensities of the stimuli were increased, the number of contractions per stimulus increased for the masseter and superficial masseter muscles but remained the same for the temporalis muscle. The technique of electromyography was shown to be simple and repeatable. It can, therefore, be a useful technique for evaluating the type of activity that is occurring in the masseter nerve during chewing. It can also be used to investigate the effects of drugs and botulinum toxin on the masseter nerve.
