Campaigners against cuts to children’s mental health services have warned a “perfect storm” of attacks on spending is looming, as a third mental health trust in a week announced plans to axe 25% of its services. The cutting of 25% of services, equivalent to the provision of 40 staff, was outlined in a letter to primary care trusts (PCTs), which are run by local commissioners, explaining the reasons for closing some of the organisation’s sexual health, smoking cessation and alcohol treatment services in Dumfries and Galloway, according to the patient-funded campaign group NHS Save Our Services. The move follows the publication of spending plans last week by the North West mental health trust – Mid and Tayside NHS and Social Care Trust. The trust said it would cut the number of children’s mental health inpatient services from 13 to six, so only one provider, community children’s mental health services, is left. Ebony Carruthers, the mother of a 12-year-old boy who was a ward of court from the age of seven and has made four suicide attempts, is leading a campaign to protect the services. She told BBC Radio 4’s Today programme that she was “not surprised” about the latest cuts: “It’s no surprise to us that there has been this perfect storm of budget cuts coming down, because primary and secondary care trusts are now all facing cuts of 25%. So we are now all in the same boat.” Carruthers, of Aspatria in north Cumbria, said her son had told her that he was frightened that the cuts would “slow him down” and “make it even harder for him to speak”.
