Liquid crystal displays (LCDs) are the most widely used form of flat panel display technology for many applications such as televisions, computer monitors, and cell phone displays. These displays are an example of a type of liquid crystal display called a direct-view display. Direct-view displays are also used for displaying special purpose information such as the current time and for displaying data from meters or gauges, for example. Many direct-view displays incorporate color filters to increase their optical efficiency and the ability to perceive a very large range of colors. Unfortunately, such color filters significantly reduce the brightness of the display and reduce the image contrast. Additionally, color filters are subject to damage. An alternative, for improving the optical efficiency of the display, is to use micro lens arrays. Micro lens arrays are formed by coating a layer of polymeric material and then patterning the material with a series of holes that can be formed by a variety of etching techniques. The results of patterning can be complicated. While the lenses of the micro lens array are small, they are not well controlled. Additionally, the non-uniformity of the array can cause significant image quality problems and crosstalk. The quality of the micro lens array also varies significantly with the temperature and the manufacturing process. An example of a simple transmissive display with a color filter and with micro lenses is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 6,416,288 B1 to Ferran et al. The patent discloses a liquid crystal display incorporating a micro lens array. The lenses of the array are large compared to the size of the pixels of the image on the display and have a focal length of 10 μm to 100 μm. The lenses of the array are formed in the edges of the color filter substrate and the spacers between the color filter and the cell control substrate are used to keep the two substrates separated.
