induced fusion of the chromosomal ends in a patient with X-linked Hunter's syndrome. Chromosomal breaks in X-chromosomes are usually repaired by non-homologous end joining, a process involving error-prone microhomology-mediated repair. It is also known that acentric X chromosomes can be eliminated through fusion of their telomeric ends. However, the exact factors that mediate this process are not well understood. Here we describe a patient with X-linked Hunter's syndrome who developed aneusomy in the cell line of a patient with the same syndrome. An X chromosome from this patient was used to probe a panel of cells from the patient with the same syndrome. We found that the X chromosome is absent in the patients' cells, and that some of the breaks in the patient are repaired by microhomology-mediated
