Maps India the world This is the fourth edition of Taylor & Francis' India's international urban mobility report 'Maps of India'. It is the most comprehensive report on urban mobility in the country, based on data gathered between 2012 and 2014. In India, it is common practice to use mapping as a tool for depicting abstract concepts, especially in news reporting. At many times it is extremely difficult to represent complex ideas in a 2D map, especially for laypersons. For example, while state governments can use maps to effectively show the size of their constituencies, or their areas, it is very hard to convey the complexities of the landmass, which is often even more diverse than India's national boundaries. The fact that India is one of the most populated countries in the world is reflected not only in the size of its population, but also in a huge number of people on the roads. This is not only a problem for the environment, but for the safety and lives of people on the road. Article 5 (para 73) of the 1994 Constitution of India provides that "the state shall have the right to provide for the protection of the environment by such measures as it may consider necessary, including, where necessary, by legislation." One of the leading laws of India is the National Green Tribunal (NGT) Act, which was enacted in 1993. From the perspective of the present authors, it is therefore important to ask the question: why is it that we still use and represent cartography as one of the most powerful tools of communication? The present research attempts to provide answers to these and other questions by examining the usage of maps in the media. The area of study is India, and the two major 'map types' used are: 1) Major disasters and catastrophes and humanitarian emergencies 2) Legal and political developments For the purpose of studying different types of maps, the present research comprised an online search of various national and international media through the following online data bases: 1) Google.com 2) Google Scholar 3) Yahoo news 4) Yahoo news archive d0c515b9f4
