You can reduce the time it takes to write a better document if you create a revision. Working from a revision document will keep your work consistent with the original version and will make it easy for you to select and use references to other documentation. 1. Create and Save a Revision The revision document should resemble the original document in layout and format. You may use a combination of general editing, font changes, page numbering, or other formatting changes. A revision document may not contain any edits to the original document. You may not make any changes to a paragraph because a paragraph may have a paragraph number associated with it, and changing it would not make a revision (unless you also made the paragraph identical to the rest of the document). Likewise, you may not change any formatting in the revision because most formatting is set up by default. Use the Revision tab in Microsoft Word Before creating a revision, be sure to save your original document (Close the document first). Open Microsoft Word and you will see a tab in the Review Document section for a revision. Click the tab and choose Create a Revision from there. A revision will appear as a tab
