What's New in the Adobe Photoshop CS6?

Spatial reference memory and the speed of processing are not impaired in dementia of the Alzheimer type: evidence from a comparison study with four other dementia groups. In a previous study, 34 patients with dementia of the Alzheimer type (DAT) and 25 patients with a non-Alzheimer type dementia (ND) were compared on a visuo-spatial learning and memory test. The patients with DAT were slower in learning the location of spatial cues on the Rey-Osterrieth figure and demonstrated poorer total retention. Since the DAT group performed significantly worse than the ND group, it was argued that the learning and memory abilities of patients with DAT were impaired. However, it is also possible that general cognitive deficits masked the effects of dementia. The present study aimed to compare the performance of 27 patients with DAT to that of 7 patients with a 'vascular dementia' (VD), 4 with a 'brief dementia' (BD), 10 with a 'frontotemporal dementia' (FTD) and 6 with a 'progressive supranuclear palsy' (PSP). Patients were tested on four short-term memory tasks (one visuo-spatial, two verbal and one non-verbal) designed to assess both speed of processing and learning ability. In two of the speed tasks, patients with DAT were significantly slower than those with ND but showed no differences from either VD, BD, FTD or PSP patients. In the learning tasks, the DAT patients were significantly slower than all other groups but showed no difference from the ND group. The results suggest that a significant visuo-spatial learning and memory deficit is evident in patients with DAT but that the impairment may be more related to a generalised impairment in visuo-spatial learning ability than to a specific deficit of Alzheimer-type dementia.
